~~Friday 18th November~~

Macbeth had just fought bravely and ~~with~~ with Banquo by his side, he had defeated Macdonald and won the battle. When they reached the heath, the weird sisters appeared and told him he would become the King. He couldn't ~~can't~~ decide to fugil the prophesy and kill king Duncan. Should he or should he not?

If Macbeth were to kill King Duncan and become king, he would get respect, fame, riches and power: he would also have control of the armies. Duncan is was old anyway, so murdering him wouldn't really make a difference. Also, Macbeth and his wife earned the right to royalty. After all, Macbeth was the one who conquered Macdonald, So ~~really~~ really, he more than deserved the crown. Didn't he?

On the other hand, he would be not just betraying the king, but also his country, which he had been just fighting for. Anyway, King Duncan is was already doing a good job at being king, and Macbeth might be a ~~bad~~ Bad king, and then people would hate him. ~~and~~ Then someone could try and succeed in killing him. He couldn't be king anyway, because of Duncan's son and even so, killing Duncan would also be killing Macbeth's own cousin. So really Macbeth Shouldn't kill the king should he?

On balance, I think Macbeth Shouldn't kill the
